Hi. This is Denis Savard of Ice Hockey Systems. Welcome. First of all we are talking about the D-Zone coverage here. One of the key things that's going to be important for D-Zone coverage is about protecting the house. As you saw up here, I put a little design here where it looks a bit like a house. My artwork is not the best thing in the world but this is what it looks like.

The three most common systems are the strong-side overload, zone coverage/box+1 and man-on-man coverage. Unlike other aspects of a hockey system, defensive zone strategies are not really implemented in a "one size fits all" approach anymore. The game has evolved. More and more teams are using certain strategies for specific game situations.

For these reasons, today's post will focus on basic coverage within the zone defense system.. As drawn in the picture above (if you guessed I don't work in graphic design, gold star for you) the lower area of the defensive zone is generally cut up into three key areas, the hit zone, the support zone and the net zone. In our system, the strong side d-man is responsible for the hit zone.
